After the the release of Premiere Pro, the Premiere documentary tool was launched. This makes

Premiere the high-end editing studio and Adobe the high-end photo retouching studio, both working together in a space between. And as Adobe launches new photo editing tools in the mobile and desktop space, such as XD and Sketch, that space is growing in size. Rather than split the company in half when moving to the high-end personal video editing space, Adobe is bringing the same integrated approach to video editing that it brought to photo editing. If you're shooting 35mm film it's not going to fill your computer's disk at 4k or 8k resolution, but if you're shooting iPhone video it just might. Adobe has built a coherent set of video tools with those same tools to help you edit iPhone video for projects. That means that, at some point down the road, when you import and edit your film or video content, much of your traditional workflow will already be primed and ready. Meanwhile, Premiere Pro, Premiere Pro Documentary, Adobe Premiere Clip, Adobe Premiere Rush, and Adobe Premiere Elements still strive to be a single coherent set of tools, but they offer the performance and sophistication needed for professional video editing. And while there's strength in numbers, those tools are better if you can have them all on one machine -- a rule of thumb for any pro content team. Accelerated editing and photo editing are fundamentally different skillsets. You can use Adobe Photoshop CC (desktop) or Photoshop Lightroom CC (mobile/Web) to edit a photo. The difference is that with Adobe Photoshop Elements (mobile/Web), you can edit a photo and turn it into an image or video. The difference is that with Photoshop (desktop) to edit a photo, you need to know to select a subject, figure out what makes that subject special, fix problems like red eye, edit a photo to add a filter or glow, and share it with the world.
