For the first time, Lightroom CC includes Lens Blur. Yes, this means that you can now create lens blurs with your photos! As a creative professional and a photographer myself, I can't tell you how much I missed this feature. Now that it is in Lightroom CC, the program becomes an amazing tool. Those who want to take traditional film photographs will feel right at home with the advanced selection tools and color sifters. For those who are still on the fence regarding the switch to digital, but are looking for a photography assistant to help enhance their prints, Lightroom CC is well worth its $20-$50 purchase. A free 30-day trial is available at www.adobe.com/creativecloud. Finally, if you are ready to make the full switch to the new workflow, I think that Adobe went all-out in their marketing for Lightroom CC. Along with the new subscription, they have a big television campaign that includes commercials and major endorsements by popular users, and the new view of LR that looks like Photoshop. I don't have anything against that, but I wish that they had gone out and spent more time to improve broken features. What I mean is that, as a photographer, I find myself continually frustrated by Lightroom's performance. More Lens tools are coming out of beta, including:

- Mercator view
- Tone Curve
- Unit Converter
- Profiles (both presets and custom filter profiles)
- Draw a Mask
