Photoshop uses color management and color profiles to manage colors consistently. These color profiles come in three flavors: sRGB, the computer industry standard; Adobe RGB, a new professional standard based on a wider gamma range; and ProPhoto RGB, a wider color gamut than either. You can control your monitor and applications to use sRGB color, Photoshop automatically uses Adobe RGB if you don't tell it otherwise, and ProPhoto RGB provides the best graphic arts color rendering. You can also change its behavior in Preferences. To reduce the work involved in choosing colors for applications and photos, icon screensavers use both these color gamut profiles by default. The Drop Shadow feature, which blurs objects without changing their color, is very powerful and easy to use. As with almost every program today, you usually begin by invoking the command palette menu to open the dialog box containing Drop Shadows. And then you select one of the predefined profiles or create a new one. You then position the mouse until you see "blurbrushes" (the tool automatically uses the selection color for this) and you adjust the degree of blur with the blurry sliders. The marquee tool is used for cropping and resizing. In addition, the new Content-Aware Crop tool, which is activated by holding down Alt (Windows) or Option (Mac OS) when you select the crop or rotate tool, mirrors existing content inside the selected area. If there are no pieces of content inside the crop boundary, the tool leaves the content alone. There is also a new multi-directional Crop tool, which allows you to drag to set a 4-sided polygon and manipulate the selection.
