While the beta has many of the core visual editing features we would expect from Photoshop, it's still in alpha and there are a few things that aren't supported yet. First and foremost, parts of the UI are unfinished - the focus of this work is to get this core experience up and running. We've also not implemented the new memory management API, so Photoshop is a bit memory heavy (about 50MB).However, this beta is not Adobe's first experiment with bringing Photoshop to the browser. We've had a web development tool that we use for running automation and interactive content creation. The idea of running Photoshop directly in the browser was initially proposed around a decade ago, but the technology to make it happen wasn't there at the time. Now we have enough tools to deliver the experience. As with all the products we release that evolve from our web development tool, we are excited to continue to move towards making Adobe Photoshop available at light speed on mobile cameras and devices.
